From the notes of Lt. Amiran Amilakhvari, Retired. In a crumbling wooden mansion on the edge of St. Petersburg, Myatlev, the melancholy prince of this intensely romantic story, drifts through his days, self-exiled from the Tsar's court, from the affairs of state appropriate to his rank, and from his rowdy former companions in the Horse Guards. The time is the 1840s, Tsar Nicholas I, whose reign began with an army uprising, now rules as an absolute autocrat, surrounded by courtiers and spies. When the Tsar beckons to the lovely baroness whom Myatlev madly desires, and she is - so to speak - preempted, the prince lapses into bitter resignation. One day, Myatlev saves a young woman from the onrushing wheels of a runaway carriage. He brings her home, tends her, and falls in love. For a little while, the old house is alive with hope; new rooms are made ready for his lovely prize, Alexandrina; and Myatlev plans their future together. But Alexandria is doomed, and she disappears, plunging Myatlev into renewed despair. Hypnotic in narrative flow, filled with fascinating characters, abductions and seductions, political intrigue, court balls, a duel, an irresistible heroine and a Hamlet like hero who is finally provoked to extreme action, this rich novel evokes another time, another place - an entire world in which to lose oneself.
